First Naval Reserves on Duty at Sands Point! The fifty-five men who went into camp at Sands Point, L. I., were drilled in signalling and taking coast soundings. The cloudy weather prevented the use of the heliograph by the Signal Corps, but by the aid of field glasses flags were used successfully. The battalion made several important discoveries in coast soundings, showing discrepancies existing in the surveyor's the soil caused Lieutenant-Commander Companies and the camp awake with a plague of rheumaturing the absence of Commander Jacob W. He had never been there before. Those who had been there before smiled as they looked at him. At 1 o'clock Corporal Jenkins returned.

"Hello! Back already?" cried his comrades. The most important work was accomplished in Hempstead Bay by Eusign Macfurlane's men. They found that the water was many fathoms shallower at that point than the surveyor's chart indicated, and that an obstruction buoy was there located, although it is not mentioned on the chart. They also "logged" many locations where torpedo boats and small naval craft could take refuge and not be seen by a supposed enemy; at the same time they could shift torpedoes into the water and escape with the boats by land and return in a round-about way before having to engage in battle.

The other boats were also locating the beet places to plant torpedoes and establish a cordon of signal stations, through which direct communication may be had from the
